Objects of Light

For 50,000 years or more, women worked together in fire lit caves, making pots and paintings. A new Exhibition in Ely throws a contemporary light on the interplay between the two arts.

Mary Romer first encountered Angela Mellor's glowing white porcelain on a dark winter's afternoon in Ely. The array of white bowls impressed with marine motifs - seaweed, sand rippled by tide, ancient rocks, brought back memories of a childhood spent on the shores of the Indian Ocean. With a small collection of Mellor's pieces installed on her shelves, it was inevitable that ceramic bowls would slip discreetly into Romer's oil paintings.

The vessels became a metaphor for thoughts and experiences distilled in memory. In the small intimate paintings featured in this exhibition, in which one form plays against another, the painter captures these tranquil moments of domestic life, when harmony prevails. Angular shapes, suggesting the elements of a traditional still life - bowls, jugs, platters, here become contemporary symbols of 'hearth and home'.

Some of the details and colours in these works are Romer's response to Italian Renaissance frescos. In Fra Angelico's 'Annunciation' there appears a small urn with white lilies, set between the angel Gabriel and the Virgin Mary, In the buildings painted by Masaccio, there are baskets of bread on window sills, terracotta flowerpots, linen hanging out and perhaps a cat curled asleep, providing a homely counterpart to the portrayals of St. Peter and the disciples below. These small and seemingly insignificant details give expressions to the intimacy shared by human beings within their homes and everyday lives.

The painter has enriched this distillation of everyday life with a warm colour palette, echoing the past, while neatly complementing the cool translucent ceramics, created by Mellor.
