ANTENNAE

A FAIR FOR THE TIMES

Founded in 1999 and thus now entering its second decade of seemingly unceasing expansion, the Affordable Art Fair, with its built-in restraints on pricing – still held at £3,000 for the latest 'Spring Collection' in Battersea Park, London (11 to 14 March) – and compulsory price labelling, has proved an understandably potent formula in these tough economic times. The organisers have always been careful to keep things fresh – the 120 galleries showing this time, for example, will be offering an entirely different range of artists to the AAF's 'Autumn Collection' – so no sense of déjà vu. As always plenty of clever new features and events as well, with an invitation going out this spring to jotta, a community of ex-University of the Arts (London) artists to curate a showcase of 18 emerging artists in an exhibit of new landscape painting entitled 'Landscape without a Map.' To see what many of the galleries will be showing at the Fair, go to p37.

MARYLEBONE MOVES

Things have been on the move in Marylebone recently, with the news that Thompson's have now left Marylebone High Street for the slightly more compact but no less attractive space down the road in New Cavendish Street formerly occupied by the Portal Gallery. Established just over 50 years ago by Lionel Levy and Eric Lister, current Portal director Jess Wilder has no plans to move to another permanent gallery, preferring instead to explore a different route, recently coming to an agreement with the Arts Club in Dover Street to put on 4/5 shows a year in their ground floor rooms. She is also taking on a few more art fairs than before – 20/21, Glasgow and the London – over the next year. The first of the Arts Club shows, 'Portal Painters at the Arts Club', opens on 1 March – no problems about non-member entry either, just turn up at the door! Judy Stafford at Thompson's, meanwhile, with a Scottish show this month, seems equally pleased at the way things have turned out – with less time now spent on thinking how to fill such big spaces, she can focus more closely on her clients' needs.

WALSALL BASH

It barely seems credible that it is 10 years since the New Art Gallery, Walsall's architecturally dramatic public gallery, opened in a blaze of publicity. Celebrations centre on a 50 artist show entitled 'Party', in which Chris Ofili, Gillian Wearing, Sam Taylor Wood and Martin Creed are among the exhibitors.

PAPER! PAPER!

Peter Ford of Bristol's Off-Centre Gallery has just had a year of the kind of busy-ness that would make most sane men blanch. Apart from being the organising genius behind the Royal West of England Academy's just-closed hit show 'Celebrating Paper' – a large and complex display of international contemporary art on paper – and finding the time in the middle of all that to go on a five-week residency at the Guanlan Original Printmaking Centre in Southern China, he is now about to open an exhibition of his own, richly varied work – paintings, etchings and collographs – in the Milner Gallery at the RWA. Just what is he on?

BACK IN THE USSR . . .

It never ceases to amaze how art can really thrive on adversity and a new show (23 February to March 6) at the Mall Galleries, provides yet more potent evidence with a major loan exhibition of one of the great, if perhaps still comparatively unfamiliar, Russian figures from the now highly regarded non-conformist artists' group of the 1960s, Vladimir Yankilensky. Branded a "degenerate" by Khrushchev in 1962, he is now regarded, along with Ilya Kabakov, Erik Bulatov and Edvard Steinberg, as one of the pre-eminent artists of that generation. Organised by the Aktis Gallery, a new venue specialising in 20th C. Russian artists working outside their native land, due to open this spring in St James's, this is a must-see show for anyone interested in Russian art of the last 40 years or so.

THE ROBERTS

Bill Hare

Being a relatively small nation, Scotland has always suffered from the view that, because of its size, it is unable to produce more than a few star artists – like Allan Ramsay – within a British and international perspective. Thus it must come as a surprise to many that Ramsay's fellow countryman Gavin Hamilton for instance, was the most celebrated British artist in 18th Century Europe – but who has heard of Hamilton today?

Robert Colquhoun and Robert MacBryde also suffered a similar reversal of critical fortunes. Yet although these working class Scottish artists are now treated as mere footnotes to the biographies of their illustrious contemporaries Bacon and Freud, in the 1940s they were rightly regarded as "the most promising and the best of the young artists" by the likes of Wyndham Lewis and David Sylvester. Of course even in their short tragic lifetimes their promising careers quickly went into a spiral of critical hostility and neglect and tragically, both died in abject alcoholic poverty.

Recently however, there have been notable efforts to reassess the significance and influential impact of the work of these two neglected painters who, as much as any at the time of British art establishment hostility to modern art, brought to the post-war London scene the innovative radicalism of European modernism. Appropriately The Scottish Gallery's March exhibition is part of this revival of interest in "The Roberts" along with Roger Bristow's new book on them, The Last Bohemians, which will be launched at the opening. A further attraction for me will be the chance to see Ken Russell's early art documentary The Golden Boys of Bond Street which will be screened throughout the exhibition.

FORWARD MARCH

William Jackson

If ever London had to re-establish its prime position in the World Art Market it had to be this February with the Impressionist, Modern and Contemporary Art Sales. The results were not only spectacular but sensational with a new world auction record for a work of art being achieved by Sotheby's. Giacometti's Walking Man I, was sold for over £65 million, superseding Picasso's Garcon à la Pipe also sold by Sotheby's in New York in 2004 for £58 million. Their total of £230 million for the series of sales was the highest ever realised in London with 32 works selling for over £1 million and 22 new artists' sale records.

Christie's, though not reaching anything like the same total, had their own successes with a high percentage of lots exceeding the estimates and a substantial number of record prices. Amongst these they achieved the highest price in the Post War and Contemporary evening sale with £5.8 million for Yves Klein's Relief éponge and a world record for a female artist with Gontcharova's Espagnole c.1916 at £6.4 million. There were also 4 works selling for over £5 million and 21 works for over £1 million.

A measure of the stunning success of the Contemporary sales is that 'artprice', the world leader in art market information, predicted a combined total of £69 million, a figure that would have represented an increase of 54% over the sales of February 2009. But in fact with Christie's total of £39 million and Sotheby's of £54 million – and that was just for their evening sales – the increase must be in the region of a staggering 200%.

The difference between the two can often rest purely on the luck of who will acquire the next major Picasso or Giacometti – or perhaps a £100 million Impressionist painting!

Nicholas Usherwood

In the volatile and fast-moving state of the present-day London art market, tradition and a long history are no longer quite the gold-plated assets they once were. Simply put, they can get in the way of change and adaptation. Thus it is no coincidence that, over the last decade or two, all of the great surviving gallery establishments that had dominated the scene since the 19th C. have undergone the most radical upheavals. Colnaghi's, for example, nearly disappeared altogether in the mid-70s and went through several anonymous ownerships before new (2002) Anglo-German management revived it enough to celebrate 250 years in the business in 2010 in buoyant spirits. Meanwhile Agnew's, another giant from the Victorian period, were finally forced to sell their huge, listed, purpose-built galleries on Old Bond Street in 2008, prior to re-opening this autumn as a largely (though not entirely) Modern British and Contemporary gallery in Albemarle Street. Similar interesting questions of re-invention have, meanwhile, been facing another of London's oldest establishments, Frost & Reed.

Founded in Bristol in 1808 – between Trafalgar and Waterloo! – before coming to London exactly a century later, they initially operated in much the same market as Agnew's and Colnaghi's though, as the 20th C. went on, the focus shifted away from Old Masters towards an increasingly more contemporary, though still traditional St James's market, in original works, most notably of Sir Alfred Munnings. Lucrative as that connection has been (and still is), even that market was moving and for a period in the 80s and 90s in their two Bond Street homes, one got the sense of a gallery finding it hard to establish a clear and original artistic identity for itself.

Things started to change 13 years ago with their move to a prime site, on the corner of Duke Street and Ryder Street, just across the road from Christie's and less than 50 yards or so from the original site of the gallery it had been bombed out of in 1941. Finding a new identity has, one senses, been rather more complicated; the acquisition, in 2006, of the contemporary Blue Gallery, set up by a former Frost & Reed employee, Giles Baker-Smith, proving, in the event, short-lived, with Baker-Smith leaving again a year or two later to work on his own. The contemporary flavour has stayed however and, with the arrival in 2007 of an extremely experienced and very stylish new MD, John Molony, it has steadily begun to regain a sense of focus and continuity.

A former Chief Executive at the Mall Galleries in the late 90s and with long stints at the Kaplan and Richmond Galleries before that, John knows the business inside out. To which he brings a very personal style also – there are not many London dealers I can think of who have played semi-professional jazz piano since their teens and can quote you, verbatim, whole passages of James Elroy Flecker's poetry! In contemporary art terms, his strong preference is towards what he terms 'observational drawing' – "the artist's response to the thing seen" rather than "the cynicism of so much of conceptualism." To this end, he is, for example, drawing on his Mall Galleries' experiences to give space to the New English Art Society's Drawing School in November and is planning, among others, a one person show for the painterly cityscapes of Kate Giles and further exhibitions of Simon Casson's bold 'takes' on art-history – "paintings observed" as he puts it.

Meanwhile the current show provides a modern re-working of their old sporting art traditions with the enormously atmospheric fishing paintings of Richard J Smith. At the same time John's love of early 20th C. Modernism has also made it felt with recent sales of works by Schwitters, Balla, Mondrian and Kisling among others, and with a show of late Impressionist Marcel Dyf scheduled for this spring. With a back-up team containing a good blend of youth and experience – long-term director Juliet Johnson and a new and enthusiastic young gallery manager, Louise Neville, among them, Frost & Reed can expect to be looking to the next 100 years with confidence . . .

the language of landscape

Mel Gooding

From January through to June, in what must be an unprecedented act of confidence and critical generosity, Bernard Jacobson is devoting no less than four consecutive exhibitions to a single artist, William Tillyer, who this year celebrates forty years of unbroken collaboration with the gallerist-publisher. The brilliant polymath painter, printmaker, watercolourist and construction maker will be showing consecutively prints, a retrospect of paintings and constructions, watercolours, and a new series of previously unseen paintings. These latter, devoted to skies, clouds, weathers, and glimpsed landscapes beneath them, have a marvellous clarity and directness. They reflect Tillyer's obsessive and persistent preoccupation with those ever-present, ever-changing phenomenal conjunctions of light, air, atmospheric dust and vaporised water above the earth on which we stand, to watch, and wonder at, every day of our lives.

Tillyer's persistent intellectualism (always underplayed in his utterance) in no way precludes a deeply passionate response to the elements of land and sky that are his constant subject: he is pre-eminently an artist in whom thought and feeling are one, whose love of what he finds in the visible world is tempered at the deepest levels of response by an awareness of the complexities of perception. This is what is most original (and difficult) about Tillyer's approach to his perennial subject: 'nature' is not simply something seen and appreciated, waiting to be portrayed and celebrated in naturalistic or abstract terms, although Tillyer's work, combining both modes, certainly does those things. Rather, 'landscape' is itself a function of the senses and the mind of the experiencing subject, it must be invented each time afresh, and his art must in some way or other provoke awareness of this, implicating the viewer in the act of imagining.

> 'Through painting you can tackle the world.'
> William Tillyer

Behind this central impulse in Tillyer's art in all media there is a philosophical coherence and a moral urgency. The world in all its wayward and apparently chaotic energy and violent beauty is brought into comprehensible existence by the repeatedly heroic human act of construction, the making of a language, the naming of parts, the imposition of a conceptual order and the thrilling reconciliation of the subjective and the objective vision. It is the task of artists to lead the way to this harmony of the human being on earth with the ineluctable otherness of nature. Artistic vision is the beginning of science.

Tillyer has always worked with a consciousness of this artistic-philosophical responsibility. And he seized very early on the grid as a visual device by which to propose and create the idea of order. Tillyer has, in fact, more often favoured the lattice or trellis, a diagonal complication of the orthogonal modernist grid, with disconcertingly homely associations of which he is well aware. (The garden is, of course, a paradigm of what Tillyer has always described as 'the furnished landscape': nature shaped and inhabited by the geometric structures of human habitation and working, from field patterns to house and barn to modern architecture in country settings.) Tillyer's mesh is, then, a visual version of what William Whewell (who invented the term scientist) described as the 'mask of theory over the whole face of nature', by which he meant that scientific reality, like artistic truth, is the fruit of imaginative and intuitive conception. Tillyer's miraculous watercolours, it must be added, are an essential component of his creative project. No artist has been more aware of the con-ceptual implications of the con- straining geometric frame against the organic flourish and arab-esque, the watery flow and atmospheric light of the painting it contains. The rectangle is not a window but a structure integral to the work.

Over the last 10 years or so Lisa Wright's large and ambitious paintings have mined the intriguing and distinctly autobiographical theme of her own children's childhood – at the swimming pool, on the beach etc – with an acute and unsentimental directness. Now, as they begin to enter early puberty, trickier issues of sexuality and psychological independence begin to surface, Wright's unceasingly painterly honesty of vision gives to them a subtly nuanced sense of dream and exultation, intuitive and without any hint of exploitativeness. (Beardsmore).

Arguably Robin Richmond's most single-minded exhibition, Stones of the Sky at Curwen draws on her enormous expertise as a painter of nature, to show her at her most elemental. Richmond's influences will speak for themselves, but forget that: this collection is a tour de force, in which the sights and scents of existence, the real essences, atmosphere, the seasons and many other areas of sensory perception have their collars felt, in evanescent visions of land and water. Richmond's habitual attentiveness to tone and palette is prominent, to magical effect. [Julian Freeman]

Australian-born and trained as an architect, Raymond Brownell has spent most of his life working in Europe and it was in Paris in 1969, at an exhibition of the great Swiss Constructivist, Max Bill, that he had the seminal artistic experience which has, over the last decade or so, come to dominate his life as a painter. Basing his art on clear mathematical principles – Fibonacci Sequence, Latin Squares and the like – the results are far from dry and formulaic as Brownell arrives at an exhilarating and intensely satisfying artistic conclusion, satisfying both mind and senses (GX Gallery).

The March show at Alan Cristea Gallery has to be seen as a major event, the first large-scale retrospective of the prints of Bauhaus artist and designer Anni Albers (b1899). Coming to fame at the Bauhaus for her work as a gifted and hugely influential textile designer, Albers only turned to printmaking comparatively late in life. With source and archive material loaned from the Josef and Anni Albers Foundation and nearly every print she ever made on show, she emerges here as an absolute master of this medium as well, endlessly and richly inventive.

Now in its 15th year – can it really be that long? – the Glasgow Art Fair seems to have established a very solid position for itself as Scotland's oldest and most significant fair. Forty-seven galleries are showing in the large marquee in Queen Square, a very substantial proportion of them from outside Scotland too, including two from Barcelona, one from Prague and another from Dublin, as well as from south of the Border, of course. The range is as wide as ever with sculpture, graphic art and photography all strongly represented alongside painting. Here are what some of the galleries at the Fair will be showing this year . . .

Lynn Stein, 'Cabbages', (detail)

THUMBnail

Set within a handsomely restored woollen mill near Sedbergh, Fairfield Mill doubles as a heritage and arts and crafts centre, but one with a very different brief to many such places with splendid exhibition galleries and artists' studios also attached. Though the focus is very appropriately on contemporary textiles and textile design – Lynn Stein's astonishing creations are one such featured this month – painters and others get a good look in, Robin Haywood's vivid Pennine scenes showing there this month and next. John McLean
by Ian Collins. Lund Humphries hbk, £35
This long awaited publication on the artist who, Bert Irvin writes, has produced "some of the most important abstract paintings of our period" is a joy to read and a pleasure to look at. With 150 colour illustrations, an informative text by Ian Collins and a supporting celebratory chorus of John McLean admirers – from fellow painters to musicians and poets – this wonderful book could be subtitled Ode to Joy. BH

David Grinaway, 'HMS Belfast'

THUMBnail

There's a refreshing sense of getting back to basics about the work of the four artists – all friends from art school days but not forming part of any self-conscious 'group' – showing at the Menier Gallery this month. Only one of them, James Lloyd, is still a professional painter – the rest work as architects – but they all share a passion for plein air painting, London as a subject and "a distinct awareness of touch and painterly values."
The outcome is paintings full of a quiet and tender poetry about the city. NU
